Download keygen Now-on-Pc .Q: Decimal type conversion when decimal is always lost I am trying to fit an expression that requires to round up a floating point number to 9 decimals. What I have tried: import math import math_ext import decimal x = 1.1 print(round(math.fpow(x, 12.0), -3)) print(round(math_ext.fpow(x, 12.0), -3)) print(round(decimal.Decimal(x), -3)) y = 0.1 print(round(math.fpow(y, 12.0), -3)) print(round(math_ext.fpow(y, 12.0), -3)) print(round(decimal.Decimal(y), -3)) Output is 409.1208597869631 409.1208597869631 409.1208597869631 0.0 0.0 0.0 I am not sure how it is rounding up when there are no decimals missing. A: Use the decimal module if you want a decimal representation. import decimal print(round(decimal.Decimal(1.1), -3)) # decimal.Decimal('1.1000000000000064') decimal.Decimal is supported for numbers of arbitrary size. Standard math.fpow function is not. You can read more in "Decimal in Python" post and "why is math.round(Decimal, x) not how I want it". A: Python's round function, by default, truncates its input to an integer. If you want to round to any number of decimal digits, you need to pass float instead of integer: x = 1.1 x_float = float(x) print(round(x_float, -3)) Or, pass a precision argument, in which case Python is responsible for deciding how many decimal digits to write. # -- coding: utf-8 -- # Generated by Django 1.11.16 on 2018-12-
